Digital technologies have profound and complex effects on international relations. What we call the “mediasphere.” has given rise to new networking practices, emerging actors, risks, and protocols. The global is more present than ever, and unprecedented issues have arisen to negotiate and promote safety in this new interconnected world. This public talk puts together diplomats and experts in digital diplomacy and security to think about the threats, challenges, and opportunities imposed by the digital. Some issues to discuss are: how is diplomacy responding to the rise of social media? Which are the most urgent risk and threats imposed by the digital, and what local and global actions are required?
